ENDLESS PROMISE

Since the end of the war, there had been a general feeling that the Public Relations Dept as we know it requires a complete and thorough overhauling if it is to serve much useful peace time purpose. With the phenomenal changes which have since then taken place in the constitutional set up in the country, that need has become still more urgent and compelling. Everybody in the country clamours for the reorganisation and even the Government admits that it is overdue.

But what has the Government done to show that it is taking steps to meet this urgent need. For the past 24 months the public has been fed on empty diet of promises without any visible sign of attempts to redeem those promises. Early in 1952, His Exellency the Governor in his speech from the throne in the House of Representatives gave the assurance that steps were being taking to reorganise the Dept. Twelve months had passed and early this year His Excellency in the same speeches again told the house that the new shape of things planned for the Dept would be placed before that session of the House.

That was some six months ago and the whole country is yet waiting to see the new look. Are we to hear at the next meeting of the House that the reoganisation is yet to come? And what exactly are the factors which make that apparently simple operation so difficult to perform. Has the Government some ugly skeleton in cupboard which it is anxious to keep from the Public? We are still waiting.
