Nationalism And African Unity

Is African nationalism a serious obstacle to African unity? This question was discussed by David Barlow in a recent BBC Africa Service broadcast when he reviewed a book called "THE UNITED STATES AND AFRICA."

The author of the section on Pan-Africanism, said Barlow, wrote that the first loyalty of African was to African; and it was to the forces inside Africa-African nationalism and Pan-Africanism—that we must look if we were to understand the shape of Africa's future politics. But the book pointed to the many difficulties that the Pan-African movement had to face, in particular what were described as real differences of outlook among African states as to the nature of post-colonial links and relations with the former colonial powers.

"Now, frankly," said Barlow, I think perhaps the author overestimates the difficulties in this field or perhaps he underestimates the determination in Africa to overcome such difficulties.

But the author thought the most serious obstacle in the path of African unity was the nationalism within each nation. What is upon, he is saying, said Barlow, is that the nature of African nationalism differs from country to country in origin, composition and its aims. These differences have all to be reconciled before a wider unity can be achieved. This is clear even from the different views among different African leaders about how this unity can and should be achieved."

Nevertheless, in spite of these differences the drive for African unity was very strong Africa, as David Williams, the editor of West Africa, had pointed out, was today trying to achieve something that no other nation had ever achieved except as a result of conquest. "And what is remarkable," concluded Barlow, "is how much has been achieved in so short a time."

37 USA University Students To Study In Nigeria

East Lansing, Michigan—Thirty-seven students from Michigan State University will participate in a five-week international study programme at the University of Nigeria.

This programme which begins August 6 is the first American student exchange programme at an African University and is being administered by the Michigan State University University of Nigeria Exchange Programme.

While at the University of Nigeria at Nsukka, the students will take courses which include Nigerian Government, society and economic development.

Big West African Order For British Trucks

LONDON—The British Motor Corporation has received orders during the last four weeks for £530,000 worth of commercial vehicles to be assembled in West Africa, from the Societe Commerciale de l'Ouest Africa, of Lagos and Accra.

Announcing this order Birmingham, a B.M.C. spokesman said the vehicles are medium and heavy trucks in the three to five ton range, and they would be shipped to the Societe Commerciale via completely knocked down form ready for assembly by local craftsmen. The B.M.C. is the largest manufacturer of vans and trucks in Europe.

"Nigeria and Ghana have been two of the company's major export markets in recent years, and we are hoping that it is a sign of the steady upward trend of business between our countries," the spokesman said. This type of business is good for local commerce because not only is local labour employed on components and materials supplied locally are also used.

He said the total orders received from the Societe Commerciale de l'Ouest Africa, the firm's distributor in Nigeria and Ghana, in the past year amounted to over £70,000.

"During 1963 B.M.C. accounted for five-sevenths percent of medium and heavy vehicles exported by the major British manufacturers to Nigeria and Ghana," he added.
