New British High Commissioner for Nigeria

Lagos—Sir Francis Cumming-Bruce, who has been appointed British High Commissioner in Nigeria, arrived in Lagos to take up his post on 27th February. He was accompanied by his wife and three of his children. His elder son is staying in England for schooling.

Sir Francis was born on 9th March, 1912, son of the 6th Baron Thurlow. He is brother and heir-presumptive of the 7th Baron. He was educated at Shrewsbury School and Trinity College Cambridge, where he took a First Class in the Classical Tripos Part I, and a Second Class in Economics, Part II. He began his career in the Department of Agriculture for Scotland, transferring to the Dominions Office (now the Commonwealth Relations Office) in 1937.

For a time in 1939 he was Assistant Private Secretary to the Secretary of State; later in the same year he went to New Zealand in the Office of British High Commissioner. He remained there until 1944, and then held a similar post in Canada until 1945.

Sir Francis was a member of the secretariat at meetings of Commonwealth Prime Ministers in London in 1946. He served with the British delegation at the Paris Peace Conference of 1946 and at the United Nations General Assemblies of 1946 and 1948. During those years he served in the Commonwealth Relations Office as Principal Private Secretary to the Secretary of State.

He went to India in 1949 to be head of the Political Division of the Office of the British High Commissioner in Delhi, returning to London and the Commonwealth Relations Office in 1952.

In 1955 he was appointed Adviser on External Affairs to Governor of the Gold Coast on Ghana becoming independent. He was appointed Deputy High Commissioner in Accra. He was Deputy High Commissioner in Canada from 1958 to 1959; in the latter year he returned to New Zealand as British High Commissioner.

Sir Francis was awarded the C.M.G. in 1957 and was created K.C.M.G. in 1961. He married in 1949 and has two sons and two daughters.

Arsenal Expect To Play In Egypt

LONDON—The English First Division football club Arsenal are awaiting official confirmation from the National Sporting Club of Cairo as to the exact date of a match to be played on the Egyptian club ground next month or in April. It is expected that a date will be decided this week.

In November, 1962, Tottenham Hotspur beat Zamalek

by seven goals to three in Cairo, and on that occasion the Egyptian team included four players from the National Sporting Club.

Arsenal have a long and illustrious history in English football. They were F.A. Cup winners in 1930, 1936 and 1950 and won the first Championship in 1931, 33, 34., 35., 38., 1948 and 1953.

Scholarships At London School Of Economics

LONDON — More West African graduates likely to become teachers of political science in their own countries will have an opportunity for high-level training at the London School of Economics and Political Science under a grant to the School just announced by the Rockefeller Foundation in New York.

The grant of about £11,250 is to help provide training and research opportunities for scholars from all over Africa, the Far East and Middle East in the field of political science with particular reference to strategic studies.

"The grant will provide five fellowship for younger scholars up to Ph. D. level. Each will come to London for one year—one a first-year student and two following years," a spokesman for London School of Economics told our correspondent.

"They will come here to work under the general guidance of the Department of International Relations which is collaborating with the War Studies Department at King's College and the Institute of Strategic Studies." The first scholar under the scheme is expected to start training in October this year," he added.

Among the many overseas students-undergraduates and graduates who study at the L.S.E. are many from West Africa.

Lord Devlin's Views On Law In Africa

Some important questions about law in Africa were answered recently by Lord Devlin, one of Britain's most distinguished judges, in the BBC African Service programme AFRICAN FORUM.

One of the questions that aroused most interest was from a Ghanaian student, who asked if it was possible for independent African countries to abandon their laws and form their own.

"Undoubtedly it's possible," replied Lord Devlin, "but is it wise? African countries are developing at a speed that is quite unprecedented in the whole history of civilisation. No other country in any other continent has attempted to move forward at this speed; and whereas the growth of an individual's system of law for a country has been something that has been spread over decades, and indeed, over centuries, at the speed at which African countries are developing there isn't time for that." If African countries were now to abandon all foreign laws, they would be putting aside something that at least served as a sound basis, and out of which the sort of law could be made that were particularly suitable.

In reply to a Uganda student, Lord Devlin considered how African law could be developed to follow on from British law and justice. "It must be rather guess work on my part", he said, "because there are many ways that could be chosen. But one way that occurs to me would be that as there is a customary law in most African countries, one might find the two systems, for the time being, going side by side." Then there might be a fusion such as there had been in Britain, where there had been the growth of Common Law and Equity side by side, then the fusion of the two when Equity took precedence over Common Law. "And if my analogy is a sound one, continued Lord Devlin" and if I can put 'African customary and traditional law in the place of Equity, then the time will come when that valuable thing, having the benefits of both."

Freedom and the Rule of Law

But interposed a student from Southern Rhodesia could African countries be expected to take the same steps and achieve the same perfection as countries like Britain and France, which had taken such a time to evolve systems based on the rule of law?

Lord Devlin sympathised with this point, and thought that countries which had taken centuries to develop a particular conception were apt to expect too much of countries which were moving forward at a faster speed. "But I think myself, that if there is one thing that ought not to be abandoned or modified any further than is necessary, it is the rule of law. That is, if you want freedom. If you don't want that, then the rule of law has no part. But if you want freedom, by which I mean the liberty of every individual to know that he cannot be imprisoned or his goods taken away without due process of law, then, although you may modify the conception of the rule of law, at least you will keep it in its essence."

A questioner from Liberia asked if powers even to a head of state could replace the principle of the rule of law:

"Well," replied Lord Devlin, "that comes to me as a conception which is entirely different a distinction to the rule of law." Freedom was preserved by right of law and not by right of the head of the state, however great a man and however able he might be.

Ultimate Power

"Government or judiciary, asked a Nigerian student, which should possess the ultimate power?"

Lord Devlin thought that each ought to have their separate and independent powers. To some extent this could be ensured by a written constitution. It was extremely important that there should be the i-bred idea of the independence of the judiciary and, at the same time, the duty of the judiciary not to interfere with the proper functions of government. "If you don't have that, however much you put into writing, you won't ensure the real independence of each."

Another Nigerian student commented: "I'm inclined to believe that the government has the ultimate power since it can pass an Act of Indemnity."

The government, answered Lord Devlin, had, in fact, got the ultimate power because the judiciary could not act except through the government. If the judiciary sends someone to prison, the government says we won't imprison him, there is nothing the judiciary can do about it. It's really the way in which one reads the question. Government or judiciary which should possess the ultimate power? I say that the powers should be separate and independent. But if you read the question: government or judiciary which has the ultimate power, the answer must be the government!"

Law In Africa

The final question in the BBC "African Forum" was of close personal interest to Lord Devlin's ques-tioners, most of whom were African law students:
What were the essential pre-requisites of qualifying barrister before embarking on a successful career in a newly-independent African countries?

Outlook For Success

Assuming that that the African country was one in which the British system of law operated, Lord Devlin thought the first necessity was to have a thorough knowledge of this system. "Not so much of the body of the system, as of the ideals that are behind it and of the virtues that make it what it is.
This means that he must have a thorough understanding of the way in which cases are conducted, the proper protection that is given to the accused, how he ought to deal with his clients and so forth."

The second need was for a ready and adjustable mind. The young African barrister would have to be ready to familiarise himself with all the important factors in African tradition and life which would become part of the law sooner or later; courts were were entirely different, and he would have to adapt himself to a very different situation.

"So I should say," concluded Lord Devlin, "Soundness of understanding first, and adaptability second.
And with those two things, and of course, with a number of clients - he ought to go far."
