British Premier Welcomes Tan- ganyika and Zanzibar Merger

LONDON—The British Prime Minister Sir Alec Douglas-Home has congratulated the leaders of Tanganyika and Zanzibar on their "wise initiative" in merging the two countries, into one state.

Sir Alec has sent the following message to President Nyerere of Tanganyika (full text): May I warmly congratulate you and Vice-President Karume on your wise initiative in creating the Union of Tanganyika and Zanzibar. I send you my sincere good wishes for the future happiness and prosperity of Tanganyika and Zanzibar in your new partnership.

A similar message was also sent to Vice-President Karume of Zanzibar.

BBC 'On New Way To Learn English'

The new system of learning English spelling that is now being developed in Britain will eventually be introduced to African educationalists. The news was given in a BBC broadcast by Sir James Pannan, M.P. who is the leader of the new spelling movement.

Speaking on the BBC African service programme WORLD HORIZONS Sir James said that the system was already being taught in Australia, Canada, the United States and other English-speaking countries. As soon as it begins going, I shall take up the question of bringing it to Africa and Asia. I think everywhere where the English language is being learnt as a second language, it will help enormously.

Sir James outlined the new system: What we've done is to realise that if you have forty sounds in English, you must have forty characters or letters. Then you must use those letters in a systematic way or else you are not being alphabetic in the true sense of the word. At present, the characters in the alphabet have more than 500 values; and he instanced the confusion by quoting all. The pronunciation remained the same for still. In the new system which was known as the Initial Teaching Alphabet, the word ill was spelt i-l-l.

hardship would be caused by a period of unlearning our letters was no difficulty whatever in transition. There is no unlearning about it at all. It literally takes only one minute for children, once they've become fluent readers in the Initial Teaching Alphabet, to become fluent readers of ordinary books. We've already had 1,500 children do this; they just put down one book and pick up another.

This method of teaching was successful with both children and adults. And insofar as learning English as a second language is concerned said Sir James of course it will be a tremendous development for adult education. But only when this is more generally used, it goes over to the children and even more so to the illiterate. This is to help the learning of English by such reading and writing as a second language.

The I.T.A. was only a temporary phase, teaching English. It is designed, Sir James explained, to lead up to the traditional English alphabet with its present number of twenty six letters, and the spelling that is used in books outside the classroom. At first, he had feared that illiterates
